Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Motley, Prose and Verse: Grave and Gay Patty. There! having made all ready for breakfast, and uncle not being down yet, I dare say I can find time to say good morning to my dearest Dummy. Oh dear! what a strange feeling this love is! It s like the wind - there s nothing to look at, and we can t tell where or how it comes; and yet we feel it, and petty keenly too. Sometimes it comes to a little breeze - that s lover s quarrel before marriage; and sometimes it comes to blows - that s always after marriage, though! but that s six months punishment now. There s some comfort in the thought that at last the arm of law is being put round us poor unprotected females. I think I first fell in love with my dear Dummy because he s so like the waxwork head in his own shop-window. There was such a hair about him, and he d such a gen-teel way of expressing his parts of speech, that I d fallen over head and ears in love with him before I knew what I was about. Of course, if I had known what I was going to fall into, I should never have done it. But, after all, it is but natural to fall in love with a hairdresser; he s so much to do with the outside of one s head, that sometimes it s impossible to prevent him getting into it. (Goes to window R.C., and throws it open. A bear is heard to growl beneath the window.) There s my dear Dummy s...
