Where a small clot imperfectly closes a sinus, blood may slowly trickle past, coagulating in thin layers until a stalactitic mass is formed, resembling a polypus. A bit of membrane or placenta may form the nucleus of such a mass. This is the so-called fibrinous polypus. The uterine mucous membrane, either the decidua vera or serotina sometimes becomes inflamed or deeply congested in patches during gestation. This may by hypertrophic growth lead to the formation of a thickened mass of mucous membrane, which may become detached after delivery with much hemorrhage. In two cases which I have seen the detachment occurred on the twelfth day after labor. Flexion or version of the womb may occasion hemorrhage, by dragging upon the uterine veins and abstracting the return of blood from the uterus. Flexions may be easily produced in the...
