What in the matter, little sprig! inquired he. You seem quite downcast. Indeed, I am so, said the juniper. My neighbors do not consider me respectable because I have no family connections. For the moment the hare quite forgot his timidity, and exclaimed indignantly: No family connections! Why, I have met your brothers and Bisters often. One who travels has an opportunity for learning many things. After a moment he added: I think you make a much better appearance than your neighbors. The juniper became so confused that it could make no reply. The hare hopped away, but the next day he came back. After that the hare came almost every day, and the two became fast friends. When winter came, the hare made his burrow nearby, and, being a gay fellow withal, he did much to make the time pass pleasantly. Oh, sighed the juniper, one day, these rocks cramp my roots so! I wish there were more earth. One should not wish for that which can never be, said the hare. You are quite a philosopher, said the juniper. The hare hopped away and was soon lost in the distance. He never returned, but often and often the juniper thought of him, and it felt that life was happier because it had known the hare. The juniper kept on growing. By and by it could see the winding road where the stage passed twice each day. Once an emigrants wagon stopped near the...
