For about thirty years, dating back from 1884, there was one man, associated with the church in Eighteenth Street who, perhaps more than any other individual, left the impress of his character upon the people generally and upon the church work. This man was Noah Levings Atwood. He was infused with an unusual degree of religious faith and unbounded enthusiasm. With the Sabbath-school he was identified through all the period of his career in the church, and when superintendent, no more painstaking or thoroughly modern director of the work could be found. Unlike most men, he seemed to have excelled in all the varied branches of work that demanded his attention, and this quality, coupled with his ever kind and sympathizing nature, made his coming always welcome, and his going a time of sadness. Besides his duties in the Sunday-school on...
